Spain changes sizes in clothes for women

Spain's biggest fashion retailers (1) have agreed to re-size their clothing in order to better reflect the real sizes of women and reduce pressure on them to conform (2) to an extremely thin image. Health Minister Elena Salgado has announced that the National Consumer Institute will measure 8,500 women between 12 and 70 years of age with the aim of "defining standard patterns and normalising sizes", according to an agreement between fashion houses and the ministry.

Companies such as Zara, El Corte Ingles, Mango and Cortefiel are behind the agreement, which intends to make fashion sizes "truthful, homogeneous and comprehensible (3)". Mannequins in shop windows will now be at least a European size 38, while size 46 will no longer be considered extra-size. Labels will include not just the overall (4) size, but information on hip and shoulder as well.

The government hopes that by selling more realistic sizes, it will discourage (5) women from trying to conform to such a thin ideal as is usually presented on fashion catwalks*. "If everything goes well, as we expect, then of course we will continue with a resizing for men", Salgado told reporters.
